A Smart Dress Developed in Attractively Combined Plain and Striped

The arrival of wider and fuller skirts cannot be denied, and many of them are held out by a heavy cord in the hem. Then there is a long, full tunic, often made of lace with a tighter underskirt below. Around the edge of the tunic are wreaths of artificial roses. The waist is of lace or tuttle and the line of the lcw neck is outlined by these same roses. The 1870 style of bodice which is so stylish now is almost always seen gleeveless. It has a long waistline and a strap over the shoulder. This waist conforms more to the figure than the waists of a few months ago and has a lining of chiffon or very light weight silk. A striking gown of this type, which I have just seen, was made of very dark blue soft silk. The straps which went over the shoulders were not applied but in one with the dress and so wide that they drooped well over the shoulder. About the round cut decollete neck was an inch wide beaded band of jet. The sleeveless armhole had a band of beaded insertion, composed of a series of long bugles placed crosswise, with a small bead on either end at the edge. A six-inch beaded girdle encircled the waist drooping well over the hips. The skirt had a long and plain tunic, slightly fulled at the waist. Just below this was noticeable a tight fitting underskirt.

The modern crinoline dress is indeed paradoxical when one thinks that altho skirts seem fuller, there is always a tighter skirt underneath. In fact, in one of the late French magezines was shown a wonderful gown in these new modes of wearing the of sheerest pale pink organdy, and hair, which only comes from constant showing through was the figure good care and much brushing. For the very dressy afternoon costume a delicate pile material, combined with velvet or with a chenile striped fabric, is stunning. The basic material for these stripes is usually chiffon or soft satin. Lace will be used this Fall on afternoon as well as evening gowns. same way whether in black or white. The style of wearing the hair is decidedly changed from last season when the ears and line of the hair on the neck and brow was invisible, but now the hair is combed straight from the back of the ears, leaving the ears expo-ed. To be absolutely correct in Paris the hair should be drawn away from the forehead, leaving it perfectly bare. Another way becoming to the woman with a high forehead is to have the hair parted on one side, not waved at all, but drawn back from the face with a light, straight fringed bang falling over the forehead.
